Just how much rain is needed to transform Utah's Olympic Valley? And what impact will a wet winter have on a drought-stricken region? Dry River Basin Resident Lori Isanti and Utah Valley University Professor of Geography Randy Sartin are working to find out. "Having the crop condition is pretty critical to our water supply this year," said Isanti. Isanti is an irrigation technician for the San Juan County Farm Bureau and spent the past two weeks driving around her southern Utah field and speaking to local farmers. "Farmers are asking for guidance, so I am out here in the field to try to give them the insight I've learned about different types of irrigation systems, how to install them, and what irrigation system they should be looking at," said Isanti. And for farmers working with delicate crops such as lettuce, Isanti warns they need to be prepared to adapt to changing conditions. "Let's say the weather turns cold really fast, when the temperatures get down to like 45 and 50 degrees, what happens to the soil moisture and what happens to the nutrients in the soil? And that would be really hard to be able to sustain a crop like lettuce." Isanti said dry conditions are hard on fragile crops. She also reminds farmers that even if it's wet this winter, they need to be ready to repair any damaged equipment as it's likely to be wet next year too. "And have that backup system in place so that you can continue to operate it if it rains next year." Utah
