Groundbreaking judge: Obamacare will hurt women (and men) Arguing before the Supreme Court on whether people must buy healthcare insurance, the Justice Department says allowing individuals to keep the same policies they have for years — and that only cover their own catastrophic healthcare needs — “would negate the fundamental purpose of the individual mandate”: forcing individuals to buy expensive insurance that covers their employees and their families. Hmmm. That’s the same rationale that Judge Richard Posner offered during the oral argument in the insurance company’s successful challenge to the individual mandate, last December, before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit: “If, contrary to the purpose of the statute, you were allowed to give the same benefits to an employee that you give to your own family, then you wouldn’t need an individual mandate.” “We have a case with a completely novel theory of the case,” Joel Aronoff, a law professor at Northwestern University, told the New York Times. “We are told that people don’t need healthcare insurance because it’s inexpensive and they can get it later.” The Court could reverse its previous decision, written in 2011 by Chief Justice John Roberts, in which it held that the individual mandate is constitutional as a tax, that consumers have the option to purchase “non-group health insurance” and that Congress may order people into groups by effectively imposing a penalty for not obtaining group insurance. Or it could affirm its previous decision and essentially invalidate the entire law, by ruling that the individual mandate is unconstitutional. Under Obamacare, there’s an individual mandate that everyone must obtain health insurance. It’s a tax. And it has been found constitutional. But it can be overturned. Obamacare will be the biggest law in the history of the nation when it is fully implemented. Including Obamacare, it will cost over $1.2 trillion in new government spending from 2015 through 2019, to implement all its provisions. But it will also be the law of the land, through at least the end of Obama’s last term, by which time many of the spending provisions will have expired. At least, that’s the wish of the law’s supporters. The key to making that wish come true is that under Obamacare, the government spends the first three years spending money and dealing
